NEWS FOR VETERANS

Chronically ill and aged veterans, hospitalized 10 to 20 years, are being rehabilitated and discharged from Veterans Administration hospitals under an advanced concept of long-term patient care established by VA.

Dr. I. J. Cohen, hospitals and clinics director in VA Central Office at Washington, D. C., said that since the new program was put into operation about a year ago, 1,159 of the initial group of 4,263 chronic hospital patients have been discharged.

"A concerted effort is made to rehabilitate these chronically ill veterans sufficiently for them to be returned to their homes, to a foster home, or to other appropriate community facilities," Dr. Cohen said.

"Those for whom this is not possible continue to receive the care and treatment needed in as nearly a home-like atmosphere as it is possible to have in a hospital."

The program for long-term patients is aimed at providing for their needs after doctors have done all that is possible to cure their disease, Dr. Cohen explained.

Continuing medical care is part of the program, but emphasis is placed on preparing patients for returning to their home communities or for living with as much independence as possible within the hospital, so theat deterioration may be prevented or retarded, he said.

Dr. Cohen said if patients with heart and blood vessel disorders, diseases of the digestive system, arthritis and other chronic conditions are allowed to lie in hospital beds year after year with only routine care, the resultant deterioration is likely to become irreversible.

"The VA program," he added, "is an all out effort by every branch of the hospital staff to rehabilitate long-term patients so they may achieve the best possible physical condition and maximum self - help, and to provide them with recreational, spiritual and social activities so as to prevent mental regression and social isolation."

AMOUNT OF SULPHUR IN AIR MEASURED BY VPI SCIENTISTS

Use of Sulphur-free fertilizers has led researchers at VPI Agricultural Experiment Station to measure the amount of sulphur in the air in Virginia.

And, reports J. A. Lutz, assistant agronomist, some wide variations have shown up from one location to another and from one season to another.

Most important though, Lutz says, is the fact that no sulphur deficiencies have been reported in Virginia up to the present time. Whether or not the symptoms (such as dwarfed plants) will show up in the future is anybody's guess. Apparently so far there is enough atmospheric sulphur to meet the needs of plants in the state, Lutz says.

Since 1953, the amount of sulphur in the air has been measured by three-month periods at 16 widely scattered locations in Virginia. The locations were Ashland, Blacksburg, Buckingham, Chantilly, Chatham, Charlotte Courthouse, Fredericksburg, Halifax, Hillsville, Kenbridge, Middleburg, Norfolk, Orange, Salem, Staunton, and Warsaw.

During the three-year period, the amount of sulphur in the air at Norfolk was much higher than at any of the other locations. The smallest amount was found at Halifax, which had only 25 per cent as much sulphur as at Norfolk. The second highest amount was measured at Salem, which had 72 per cent as much as Norfolk.

In each of the three years, the greatest amounts of sulphur were measured during the months of December, January, and February; the next highest amounts during September, October, and November; the third highest amounts during March, April, and May, and the least for June, July, and August. This variation was caused by the fact that the main source of sulphur in the air is coal smoke, and more coal is used during cold weather.

Also, there is more sulphur in the air near industrial areas, where considerable amounts of coal are used, than in certain rural areas. Likewise, there will be more sulphur in the air on the east than on the west side of any industrial area in Virginia, since the prevailing winds in the state are from the west.
